

MILTON

and his Modern Critics

by

LOGAN PEARSALL SMITH

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS
LONDON: HUMPHREY MILFORD

1940

.

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS
AMEN HOUSE, E.C. 4
London Edinburgh Glasgow New York
Toronto Melbourne Capetown Bombay
Calcutta Madras
HUMPHREY MILFORD
PUBLISHER TO THE UNIVERSITY

PRINTED IN GREAT BRITAIN

‘An interesting paper, or even book, might be written on Milton and his Critics.’

RICHARD WATSON DIXON to GERARD MANLEY HOPKINS.

‘Milton’s dislodgement in the past decade, after his two centuries of predominance, was effected with remarkably little fuss.’

Revaluation, 1936, by F. R. LEAVIS, Cambridge University Lecturer in English.

NOTE

THE reputation of a famous poet may undergo after his death various mutations. A burst of funeral eulogy will sometimes permanently dim his fame; but again this reaction may be followed by a counter-reaction which will enhance it greatly. Or his name may even be grouped with the great names of Antiquity, to shine for ever among those fixed and no longer variable stars.

Such has been the fate of Dante, and such has seemed likely to be that of Milton, since the sublimity of his achievement was, for two hundred years, regarded as being beyond all question. How it has been of late called in question; how certain modern critics (from America and Cambridge) have daringly attempted to scale the heavens and dislodge him from his consecrated throne, is recounted in this little book. It may be of interest to those who are amused by following the stream of modern criticism and observing its 'mazy errors' (I borrow Milton's phrase); others may be moved, as Milton's Deity was moved, to laughter at the 'quaint opinions wide' of contemporary thinkers.

MILTON AND HIS MODERN CRITICS

I

'MILTON,' Mark Pattison said in his famous life of that poet, 'is the first English writer who, possessing in the ancient models a standard of the effect which could be produced by choice of words, set himself to the conscious study of our native tongue with a firm faith in its as yet undeveloped powers.'

This was for Milton an irresistible impulse, a vocation; from an early period he felt it to be a knightly, almost sacred, calling. In a poem belonging to his nineteenth year, he declared his intention, not to write in Latin (as many wise people thought the wiser way), but in English, making his native tongue 'search her coffers round' for appropriate words and phrases. Such was the controlling impulse of his later life; by his pen he determined to defend the cause of Religion, of Liberty, and the Commonwealth; and even when blindness compelled him to lay down that weapon, he felt still convinced that he was destined to compose by means of words something that the world would not willingly let die.

MILTON AND HIS

He was amply rewarded, not only by the acquisition of a vocabulary of invective which puts Billingsgate to shame, but by a whole treasure-trove of jewel-tinted words—shells of sound, so full of overtones, and arousing such echoes after echoes of association, that they have won him the enduring fame of the golden alchemist of our language.

Fair silver-shafted Queen for ever chaste. . . .

All night the dreadless Angel unpursu'd. . . .

Nymphs and Shepherds dance no more

By sandy Ladons Lillied banks. . . .

In shadier Bower

More sacred and sequesterd, though but feignd,

Pan or Silvanus never slept, nor Nymph,

Nor Faunus haunted.¹

Where the great vision of the guarded Mount

Looks toward Namancos and Bayona's hold. . . .

It would have seemed, but a few years ago, that no reputation was more firmly fixed in the heaven of poetry than that of the author of these and hundreds of other lines of equal beauty. The genius of Milton was indeed almost at once recognized; Dryden, though a Royalist and a Roman Catholic, was yet true to his art when he said (as is reported), 'This man cuts us all out, and the ancients too.'¹

¹ John Bailey, in his excellent book, Milton, in the Home University Library, describes these as 'perhaps the loveliest lines in all the Paradise Lost' (p. 112). He protests, however, very rightly, 'that no fragment of a few lines can convey a full impression of the rhythmical, intellectual, imaginative unity of the Miltonic paragraph or section' (p. 183).

Even Dr. Johnson, who did not love the regicide poet, is forced into an unwilling but noble praise of Milton, whose 'natural port is', he says, 'gigantick loftiness'; while of Paradise Lost he writes: 'The characteristic of this poem is sublimity', 'What other author ever soared so high, or sustained his flight so long?'

The nineteenth-century critics were even more emphatic in their praise of Milton, whom they regarded as being in a class apart, far above all those who had used the English language for poetical purposes. Landor said that Paradise Lost was 'the noblest specimen in the world of eloquence, harmony and genius'. Macaulay wrote without exaggeration that, 'by the general suffrage of the civilized world his place had been assigned among the greatest masters' of the art of poetry. 'Time', Byron sang in Don Juan, makes the word 'Miltonic' mean 'Sublime'. 'Milton's art is incomparable', Gerard Manley Hopkins wrote to Dixon, 'not only in English literature, but I should think, almost in any; equal, if not more than equal, to the finest of Greek or Roman.'

¹ Indeed, three years after Milton's death, Dryden wrote of Paradise Lost as 'being undoubtedly one of the greatest, most noble and most sublime poems which either this age or nation has produced' (Preface to the State of Innocence and Fall of Man, an opera, 1677).

This chorus of laudation grew even louder in the first two decades of the present century, when it was combined with an even greater effort to grasp the essence of Milton, and a more profound study of his age, his character, his influence, and the sources upon which he drew. A new conception was brought forward, especially abroad, of Milton as no mere Puritan poet, but as a figure of world importance—one of the greatest poets, and most powerful artists, of all time. A bibliography has been compiled of foreign and American books and essays on this theme.¹

All the Miltonists seem to take for granted, not only Milton's importance as a world poet, but the greatness and nobility of his character as well; all except a certain German named Mutschmann, who tried to prove that Milton was not only an albino¹ and a Neo-Stoic, but 'a moral monster, who had committed the most shameful offences, and who was prevented by his cowardice alone from developing into a great criminal.'

¹ By Denis Saurat, the most eminent of French Miltonists. It is published in his work, Milton, Man and Thinker (1929).

II

All this was, however, but a storm in academic tea-cups; even the diabolic Mutschmann did nothing at all to injure the fame of him whose soul, in Wordsworth's phrase, 'was like a Star, and dwelt apart.'

It was not till the end of the second decade of the present century that an attempt was made to dim that star. Thus renewed interest in Milton had no connexion with the movement abroad I have just mentioned, whose effect was to enhance Milton's glory. It was, on the contrary, a hostile attack, and it caused, curiously enough, a certain perturbation in English academic circles. Its story is perhaps worth a note, though there is no need to exaggerate its importance in the history of English taste.

The assault was launched in England, though not by assailants of English birth. Just when ¹ The question of albinism depends upon whether or not the term 'abrown' which Aubrey used to describe the colour of Milton's hair meant 'white' in the seventeenth century.

Milton's orb was tricking its beams abroad, and the accustomed litany of drowsy praise was sounding from the chairs of all the professors of English literature, there disembarked on the shores of this island, one after the other, two adventurous young Americans from the Middle or farther West of their vast country. The first of these conquistadors to arrive had small academic standing; brought with him, indeed, little beyond an immense self-confidence in his own talents, and an equally immense contempt for those of other writers. He had, as well, a mission, a crusader's mission, which he came to proclaim to the large indifferent city he had crossed the seas to conquer.

His name was Ezra Pound. Though born as late as 1885, his birthplace, like that of Homer, is a matter of dispute: in Who's Who it is not named. I have seen Montana mentioned, and also Idaho. The state of Idaho has, I believe, the stronger claim. He arrived in London from Paris in 1908, at the age of twenty-three. There is a story—for Ezra Pound, though still living, has become almost a legendary figure—that this youngster from the Wild West made his first English appearance wearing a large cowboy hat, and flourishing in his hand a cowboy whip, which he would crack to emphasize his remarks. This information was furnished me by his first English publisher, Elkin Mathews; but when, in my attempt to confirm it, I wrote to a friend of the poet's, I was told in answer that he had never seen Pound in cowboy costume: when he met him first, in 1911, he was dressed as a Regency buck.

However apparelled, he came to London, another of his friends tells us, a complete stranger, without either literary patronage or financial means. Although few poets, we are informed, have undertaken the siege of London with so little backing, Pound soon attracted attention; editors gave favourable reviews to the little volume of verse entitled Personae, which Elkin Mathews published. In the Evening Standard it was praised, and in the Daily News; Pound was described in Punch as 'the new Montana (U.S.A.) poet, Mr. Ezekiel Ton, who is the most remarkable thing in poetry since Robert Browning'. Back across the Atlantic the name resounded; a Pound was mentioned in the Chicago News and the Chicago Post. All this more authentic information I derive from a pamphlet entitled, Ezra Pound His Metric and Poetry, which was published in New York in 1917. This pamphlet, though unsigned, was written by Mr. T. S. Eliot, who can be counted as the second of these American crusaders. Mr. Eliot was also born in Western America, whither his grandfather had emigrated to the banks of the Mississippi river. He belonged, however, to an intellectually aristocratic New England family, of which the famous president Eliot of Harvard was a distinguished member. T. S. Eliot was educated first at a school in his native city, St. Louis, afterwards at Milton School near Boston, and then at Harvard, where he became Assistant in Philosophy. In 1914 he was given a travelling fellowship, which took him first to Germany and then to Oxford, where he spent the winter of 1914-15 at Merton College. In 1915 he became a schoolmaster at Highgate, and in the following year accepted a position in Lloyds Bank, which he occupied for nearly nine years. In 1927 he became a British subject.¹

MILTON AND HIS

III

Whether Mr. Eliot and the slightly older Mr. Pound had made each other's acquaintance in

¹ For a full account of Mr. Eliot's career, see the admirable book of American criticism, The Achievement of T. S. Eliot, by F. O. Matthiessen, Oxford University Press, 1935. (Cheap edition, 1940.)

America I do not know, but they soon became allies and collaborators in London.¹ Mr. Eliot certainly owes great obligations to Mr. Pound, which he has always been scrupulous to acknowledge. It is clear that in the years when he was first out of college he derived a great stimulus from the older poet's enunciation of his poetic theory; and that later many of his tastes and opinions first crystallized as a result of his close association with the author of Personae. His longest and most important poem, The Waste Land, seems, as several critics have pointed out, to be written in the form and style of the Cantos of Ezra Pound, to whom, as il miglior fabbro, it is dedicated. Like the Cantos, The Waste Land is loaded with learned references and interlarded with quotations;² and in addition to this form of a literary medley, Eliot seems to have caught from Pound that morbid preoccupation with squalor which, as a recent critic has pointed out, 'plays on the frayed nerves of modern intellectuals'.

¹ Many years later Mr. Eliot, when lecturing at Harvard University, told his audience that when he and Pound were working together on some journal which he does not name, but which may have been the Little Review, or Wyndham Lewis's Blast, they were mentioned 'by a writer in the Morning Post as "literary bolsheviks", and described by Mr. Arthur Waugh as "drunken helots"'. (The Use of Poetry and the Use of Criticism, 1933, p. 71 n.)

² The American critic, Edmund Wilson, says that this poem of only 403 lines includes 'quotations from, allusions to, or imitations of, at least thirty-five different writers . . . as well as several popular songs', and introduces 'passages in six foreign languages, including Sanskrit'. (Edmund Wilson, Axel's Castle, p. 110.)

And yet this in many ways grotesque poem is a poem of real importance; we cannot pooh-pooh it away. Mr. Eliot has succeeded in what is perhaps the most difficult and important of all poetic achievements; he has created a new and personal rhythm, a choice and distinction in his use of words, which are all his own; and in spite of his meagre output, it is hardly an exaggeration to say, with the best of all living American critics, that 'Eliot, in ten years' time, has left upon English poetry a mark more unmistakable than that of any other poet writing English'.¹

How enduring this mark will remain is a question for Posterity to decide. Certainly Antiquity (if I may be taken as its representative) can pretend to little voice in that decision. It may, however, be permissible to one who treads with aged steps the traditional paths of critical appreciation, adorned as they are with such a wealth of enduring masterpieces, to look upon this Pound and Eliot¹ school of poetry as being not unlike those other literary movements whose rise and fall he has witnessed in his own lifetime; fanatical enthusiasms accompanied by furious denunciations of those who are critical of such fervours. Such was the almost religious admiration, to take one instance, of George Meredith's poetry, which was a kind of gospel in my youth. This was followed in more recent times by the cult of Paul Valéry in France, and that of Gerard Manley Hopkins in England. But the course of literature is bordered by the conventicles of half-forgotten cults, whose chapels of malease are seldom visited now, though amid the rubbish of old papers heaped up in them the literary researcher may find perhaps fragments of poetry which possess the sudden, ecstatic loveliness we find in the poems of that lord of ¹ The two have always been closely connected. In 1928 Mr. Eliot published a selection of Mr. Pound's poems. This selection I have read: it contains much that is amusing, but nothing that to my ear sounds in the least like poetry—nothing comparable, for instance, to the beautiful, if incomprehensible, lines with which one of Mr. Eliot's religious poems on Ash Wednesday opens:

¹ Axel's Castle, p. 111.

'Who walked between the violet and the violet
Who walked between
The various ranks of varied green
Going in white and blue, in Mary's colour.'

alcovists, and real master of Pound and Eliot—the enigmatic ‘black prince of wit’, the squalid and divine poet, Donne.

But the verse of this modern school is, after all, not my concern: both Mr. Pound and Mr. Eliot have published prose volumes of what purports to be scholarly criticism; and Mr. Eliot, lecturing in America in 1933, described Ezra Pound as not only the most important English poet then alive, but also as a ‘very learned poet’.¹ As to the importance of Mr. Pound’s poetry, Posterity must be the judge. But with regard to scholarship, scholars are capable of passing an unquestionable verdict, and about Ezra Pound the opinion of scholars is unanimous. He has published translations from, or paraphrases of, Latin, Provençal, Chinese, and Japanese poems; but specialists in these subjects are apt, I have noted, to laugh when his name is mentioned. Latin scholars, in especial, have administered such remorseless castigations, that one must almost envy the thickness of skin which has enabled Pound to survive them. But he who wields the whip had best learn himself to bear its lashes. In a letter to the New Statesman, Mr. A. C. Taylor wrote that Pound’s renderings of

¹ After Strange Gods (1934), pp. 41–2.

Propertius showed an ignorance of Latin that many schoolboys might well be ashamed of. He mistakes, for instance, the verb canes ('thou shalt sing') for a noun and translates it 'dogs'! 'Cimbrorumque minas et benefacta Mari' Mr. Taylor renders as 'the threats of the Cimbri and Marius' great services to his country'. 'Mere scholars,' he goes on to say, 'consider this to refer to the invasion of Italy by the Cimbri and their defeat by the great Caius Marius at Vercelli, which saved Rome from probable downfall, but Mr. Pound is not of their opinion and prefers "Welsh mines and the profits Marus [sic] had out of them".'¹ Mr. Martin Gilkes repeats this amazing translation in an article in English devoted to Pound's veritable snowstorm of howlers.² 'Even if Mr. Pound,' he writes, 'had decided that the Cimbri must be the inhabitants of Cambria, could he not have looked up minas in a dictionary and found that it does not mean "mines"? Evidently he did not take the trouble, and in consequence makes Propertius look as much of a fool as would a modern author if he talked of "the fortune made by the great rather than to inquire, to revise accepted laws, even to overturn' them. One cannot but feel that Mr. Eliot has himself yielded to the same temptations. When he remarks casually that the play of Hamlet, so far from being Shakespeare's masterpiece, 'is most certainly an artistic failure'; that Goethe was no great success as a poet, and that he feels a distaste for Shelley's poetry, and finds his ideas repellent, that England 'has produced a prodigious number of men of genius and comparatively few works of art', I am disconcerted and amazed. This way of writing has been described by one of Mr. Eliot's admirers as his famous 'oblique' method of criticism—the quiet but deadly stabs, that is to say, which he gives to the established reputations of those whose example might be quoted to support conclusions contrary to his own.¹

¹ The New Statesman and Nation, May 22, 1937.

² 'The Discovery of Ezra Pound', by Martin Gilkes, in English, vol. ii, no. 8, 1938.

¹ Stepping Heavenward, by Richard Aldington: Chatto & Windus, 1934, p. 29. In the slight disguise of the imaginary biography of a certain Jeremy Pratt Sybba, this book gives what seems a highly eulogistic (if now and then ironic) portrait of Mr. T. S. Eliot. Its hero is born, like Mr. Eliot, in the middle eighties at a town of the Middle West; and, early conscious of a distinguished New England ancestry, conceives the project of establishing himself as an authoritative critic. To London he ultimately proceeds: and little by little, with cautious manœuvres, and with the publication of little 'exposure' essays, he comes to be hat Mr. F. L. Lucas has described as the 'stern, cold insolence' of Mr. Eliot's enormous talents,¹ is a quality which Mr. Eliot and Mr. Aldington share together, and they also share a mutual dislike for, and contempt of, Milton's poetry. This link between them (and a shared sympathy for the dethronement of Milton) brings me back to the subject of this paper, the attempted dethronement of Milton.

In 1888 Matthew Arnold, at the unveiling of the statue of Chaucer in Westminster, had pontifically declared that 'Milton, of all our English race, is the greatest artist in diction and rhythm the one artist of the highest rank in the great style whom we have; to take as requiring no discussion, this I take for certain.' But it almost seems that it was for the very purpose of discussing this point that the two young Westerners had crossed the Atlantic, and as the critic of critics, whom no one dares to criticize. The eagerness of Sybba's output is admitted; his support of anarchism and the Anglo-Catholic movement are mentioned, the fact that much of his time is spent in thoughtful gloom, wholly of a religious nature. Our author rejects, however, with indignation the theory of certain critics who hold that all of our literature can be explained by an inner unrelaxed constraint by which Americans are afflicted. Mr. Aldington's book is largely a denunciation of these 'constipationists', as he calls them. Mr. Lucas has collected a number of these in his Studies in American Literature and English, pp. 308-9.

Atlantic. Like the Titan of old who dethroned Uranus, it was the aim, it appears, of one of them at least, to scale the skies and topple Milton from his place in the heaven of English literature. A fantastic undertaking, surely, of which the most fantastic feature is the success, if only temporary and very partial, which has crowned it. Belonging as I do to an older generation of expatriates from across the Atlantic—the generation of Whistler and Sargent and Henry James, of Berenson and Santayana—with all of whom I have been more or less acquainted, I have seldom met any of the flight of refugees which succeeded ours; what I know about them is derived from books of reference, or from what is, I fear, but a partial reading of their verse or prose. Much of this writing seems to me fantastic, but I regard with admiration their adventure which, just because it is so charmingly fantastic, seems to me what we should call in our native idiom ‘some adventure’.

With Mr. Pound, a loathing of Milton had early become an obsession; and in an essay written, I believe, in 1918, and reprinted in a volume entitled Make it New (1934), he speaks of the personal active hatred of Milton, which he had already expressed in year-long diatribes, his disgust with all that he has to say, 'his asinine bigotry, his beastly hebraism, the coarseness of his mentality'.

Mr. Eliot is far too urbane to express his disapproval in such Miltonic terms; he often hints at it in his quiet way—his 'deft, inconspicuous sniping', as one of his admirers describes it. In his first volume of criticism, The Sacred Wood, when speaking, for instance, of the degeneration of blank verse from Shakespeare to Milton, he says that after the erection of the 'Chinese wall of Milton', blank verse has suffered not only arrest but retrogression; and in his later publication, John Dryden (1932), he mentions Dryden as being 'far below Shakespeare, and even below Milton'. Mr. Pound shouted abuse, but Mr. Eliot's quiet hints proved more effective. Somehow they carried weight, and before long certain professors of English literature began to tremble in their academic chairs. In addition to Mr. Eliot's inconspicuous, yet deadly, sniping (note the tiny drop of poison in the phrase quoted above, 'even Milton'), what terrified the Professors most was, I think, a theory Mr. Eliot put forward (dark and difficult to understand) that in Milton there occurred a kind of disassociation of sensibility, a splitting up of the personality, which interrupted the progress of English poetry for a hundred years. This notion is repeated in almost all the pronouncements of the Miltonoclasts. Not having been taught to think in periods, I confess that I fail to grasp its meaning. Indeed, I can find little or no signs of progress of any of the arts through this century or that. Whistler's dictum, 'Art happens', seems to me all that one can say with any assurance on the subject.

V

Among the first of the English journalists to join with our American friends in their attack on Milton was the well-known writer, Mr. Middleton Murry. In 1922 he published a little volume entitled The Problem of Style, in which to my mind he singularly failed to solve this large problem. As a clue, however, to its solution, he quotes a chance remark from one of the letters of Keats, that Paradise Lost was a 'corruption of the English language'. He omits, however, to mention that, not a month before, Keats had found Paradise Lost 'every day a greater wonder', and that the later sentence was written in a momentary revulsion from the influence of Milton, which, when writing Hyperion, Keats had found too overpowering.

✓ Robert Bridges, in his essay on Keats, which is regarded by many as one of the finest pieces of literary criticism in our language, expresses his opinion that the best period of Keats's writing was when he fell under Milton's influence, and that in Hyperion 'we are conscious at once of a new musical blank verse, a music both sweet and strong, alive with imagination and tenderness'.¹

All this, however, Mr. Middleton Murry ignores. 'There is death in Milton', he reiterates, and writes, 'I do not know whether he greatly enriched it [the English language] and I have felt many times in reading Paradise Lost and Samson Agonistes that he all but killed it.'

The next recruit was Mr. Herbert Read. In 1928 he published a book on English Prose Style, in which there is, I believe, no attack on Milton. In his collected essays he says, however: 'Milton did not think poetically, but merely expounded thought in verse; psychologically he was conscious all the time of a dualism, on the one hand the thought to be expounded, and on the other side the poetic mould into which his thought had to be smelted.' Mr. Read adds, however, 'this distinction so briefly expressed may seem a trifle on which to dismiss so established a reputation as Milton's, and it must be admitted that the whole matter needs careful analysis and consideration'. In October 1930, in the organ of this group, the Criterion (edited by Mr. Eliot), he writes: 'The critical conception of Milton is undergoing an almost complete transformation. In general the process is one of disintegration.' Mr. Read goes on to repeat most of the charges brought by Mr. Eliot against Milton; that disassociation of sensibility which is mainly due to him, and from which English poetry has never recovered. He also repeats as a charge against Milton his use of foreign idiom—a charge which I shall refer to later. Mr. Read ends with the familiar statement that 'it was the example of Milton that inhibited Keats and destroyed Wordsworth'. Mr. Read was also appointed Clark Lecturer at Trinity College, Cambridge. It is curious how these Clark lecturers are apt to repeat each other, and how, if an innovator starts, like Mr. Eliot, a war against clichés, his most enduring effect is to enrich criticism with a new collection of them.

¹ A Critical Introduction to Keats (Oxford University Press, 1929), p. 106.

VI

The news of the threatened fall of Milton was brought by these lecturers to the seat of Milton's education, where the watchers of the Cambridge skies were prepared to witness this celestial catastrophe without, I believe, any very deep regret. That son of Cambridge, Walter Raleigh, who in 1900 published a book about Milton of wise and beautiful appreciation, had long since gone to occupy a chair at Oxford; and indeed, save for this one tribute, Cambridge had shown few signs of regard for the poet whom the world has come to consider her most illustrious son. As an undergraduate he had been given, at Cambridge, from his singular personal grace and beauty, the derisive nickname of 'The Lady of Christ's' and he is reported, some hold falsely, to have undergone there the indignity of being flogged by his tutor ('whipt him', Aubrey says briefly in an added note). Milton himself tells us that he was sent away from Cambridge for a time, though he was afterwards allowed to return and take his degree. Milton disliked Cambridge as much as Cambridge disliked Milton, and he was apt to write—as three other Cambridge poets, Dryden and Gray and Wordsworth, wrote—in disparagement of that seat of learning. He loathed the college discipline, and ‘the scraggy and thorny exercises of monkish and miserable sophistry’, nor was he edified by the spectacle of so many young divines ‘writhing and unboning their clergy limbs’ on the stage. Very differently did he write in his Ode to Rouse, Bodley’s Librarian, of Oxford with its woods and its valley in which Apollo dwelt, ‘preferring it to Delos and the twin peaks of Parnassus’.¹

When, in the earlier part of the eighteenth century, Milton’s fame had been universally established, his eidolon or image underwent at Cambridge a posthumous adventure, more grotesque surely than the shadow of any poet had ever before experienced. The most learned scholar of that University, and indeed the greatest scholar of his age, and perhaps of any age, the venerable, famous, and ferocious Richard Bentley, prepared, at the suggestion of good Queen Caroline (in order that she and others unversed in Greek and Latin might enjoy Bentley’s gift for emendation), a new edition of Paradise Lost, and published it in 1732 as a handsome quarto. The text of this poem, such was Bentley’s belief, could not have come to us from the hand of a graduate of Cambridge; Cambridge must repair the wrong done to it by the ignorant amanuensis to whom the blind poet had dictated it, and above all by the half-educated editor who, after extensive mutilations and interpolations, had taken it to the press. Bentley's episcopal biographer, James Monk, tells us that this scholar, having contracted an aversion to 'the rapturous flights of genius and glowing language which distinguish the divine poem', had proceeded to remove all the presumed interpolations of the imagined editor.

¹ E. M. W. Tillyard, Milton (1930), p. 171.

This performance of Bentley's is so well known that there is no need to say much about it. Perhaps the most famous of his triumphs is the emendation of the lines in Book I, describing the 'Dungeon horrible' of Hell—

No light, but rather darkness visible
 Serv'd only to discover sights of woe.

Darkness visible, that can yet illuminate—a flat contradiction, Bentley exclaims. He suggests instead, 'A transpicuous gloom'.

Even more brilliant is Bentley's rewriting of those last two lines of the epic—that quiet dying fall with which the poem ends:

They hand in hand with wandring steps and slow,
 Through Eden took thir solitarie way,

Wandering steps? Bentley pertinently asks. Very improper, since just before we had been told that they had Providence for their guide. And why solitary, since they had no less than what they had always had, each other's company? Surely Milton should have written,

Then hand in hand with social steps their way Through Eden took, with Heav'nly comfort cheer'd.

Such a translation into English as she is spoke at Cambridge was too much, even for that son of Cambridge, Sir Walter Raleigh. He could find no answer to it: far too frail, he said, were the organs of human speech.

When Bentley comes on the lines in the Second Book describing the Hell Hounds which barked about the image of Sin,

Farr less abhorrd then these Vex'd Scylla bathing in the Sea that parts
Calabria from the hoarce Trinacrian shore:
Nor uglier follow the Night-Hag, when call'd
In secret, riding through the Air she comes Lur'd with the smell of infant blood, to dance
With Lapland Witches, while the labouring Moon
Eclipses at thir charms, the Master of Trinity loses his temper completely. Let the editor, he exclaims, 'take back his fabulous Night-Hag, his Dance of Lapland witches, and his Smell of Infant Blood, and not contaminate this most majestic Poem with trash, nor convey such idle, but dangerous Stories to his young and credulous Female Readers'.

VII

Modern Cambridge scholars are made, however, of even sterner stuff than the exasperated Bentley, and believe that the text of Paradise Lost comes to us just as it fell from Milton's lips.

Mr. Middleton Murry's war-cry, 'There is death in Milton', seems indeed to have echoed agreeably in Cambridge ears, and shortly after the publication of his book on Style, the authorities of Trinity College appointed him Clark Lecturer on Literature. But by the most serious thinkers of that University it was held that the revaluation of Milton, his discanonization and unconstellation, were due first and most of all to another Clark Lecturer, Mr. T. S. Eliot. Both Dr. Tillyard, the author of an earnest and useful book on Milton, and now Lecturer in English at Cambridge, and Dr. Leavis, also Lecturer in English there, are emphatic on this point, and before very long Mr. Eliot was elected to an Honorary Fellowship at Magdalene College.

I must say that I think it rather hard that no leaf of academic laurel has been placed on the brow of Ezra Pound, who was, if not the only begetter, at least the first to proclaim the 'DOWN WITH MILTON!' doctrine (one falls into capital letters when writing of Ezra Pound from their frequent appearance in his writings). No Lecturership, no Fellowship was bestowed upon him, indeed his name is never mentioned. Apparently it sounds somewhat harshly in academic ears.¹

I must pause a moment to speak of three other Cambridge critics, Professor Bonamy Dobrée, Dr. Frank Leavis, and Mr. F. L. Lucas. Professor Dobrée, who was born in 1891, is a graduate of Cambridge; with Mr. Herbert Read he edited that strange compilation, The London Book of English Prose. He shares the views about Milton of Mr. Pound, Mr. Eliot, and Mr. Read. 'Milton', Sir Herbert Grierson quotes him as saying, 'made the language stiff and tortuous, even distorted, unusable in that form by other poets, as Keats was to discover, but Dryden made it miraculously flexible. Milton may be the greater poet of the two, but in this respect he injured our poetry, while Dryden conferred upon it the greatest possible benefit.¹ How all these critics echo and repeat each other! Grierson is made a little impatient at hearing such parrot cries. Moreover, he has always disliked and distrusted, he says, this estimate of a poet by his influence upon others. In the first place the worth of a work of art is absolute and not relative. In the second, these judgements are very hard to make good, and as a matter of fact Dryden himself gained strength from his reading of Milton.

¹ Edmund Wilson thinks that of this combination perhaps Eliot is too highly praised, and Pound, though he has deeply influenced a few, has been on the whole unfairly neglected (Axel's Castle, p. 111).

Could it not be as plausibly maintained that Milton, in spite of all his dull eighteenth-century imitators, whose epics and didactics hang, as Professor Oliver Elton has said, like a curtain of felt between his age and ours, has conferred upon the poets who succeeded him a benefit far greater than the injury Mr. Eliot says he inflicted upon them? That his syntax, his diction, by enriching the poetry of Thomson and Gray and Cowper, and above all of Keats, was one source of the splendour of our great Romantic Movement?

But any such notions are far from the mind of the youngest and boldest of the Cambridge critics, Dr. Frank Leavis, who was born in 1895, elected a Fellow of Downing College in 1936, and appointed University Lecturer in English in the same year. He has already published six volumes of criticism, mostly, I believe, criticism of poetry. I cannot say that I have read them all, but from an essay in a book of his, entitled Revaluation: Tradition and Development of English Poetry (1936), I will quote a sentence or two. Dr. Leavis says of the versification of Paradise Lost that a great deal 'strikes one as being almost as mechanical as bricklaying'; and of Samson Agonistes, that much of the verse is stiff and mechanical; and elegantly asks 'how many cultivated adults' could honestly swear that they had read it through with enjoyment. He says cheerfully, however, that owing to four or five asides of Mr. Eliot 'Milton's dislodgement in the past decade, after his two centuries of predominance, was effected with remarkably little fuss'.

¹ H. J. C. Grierson, Milton and Wordsworth, 1937, p. 122.

We may smile at such pronouncements; but an uninterrupted tradition of detraction may do something to deprive great writers of their possible admirers, and, as Mr. F. L. Lucas says, distort the taste and enjoyment of many people. I have always regarded Mr. Lucas as the best and sanest of the younger Cambridge critics, and almost the only one of them who has some knowledge of the lovely art of writing. He to the company of Matthew Arnold and Swinburne and William Morris and Robert Bridges, while in the groves and Cambridge gardens the birds of song left their nests almost empty. 'How ill that place', as Milton wrote to Diodati, 'suits the votaries of Apollo!'¹

VIII

E'en in our ashes live their wonted fires, and here I find myself railing at Cambridge as I was wont, when a crude Oxford undergraduate in my twenties, to rail at that University. Then I might have pleaded my youth as an excuse for my tribal folly, but such an excuse is hardly available at the somewhat maturer age of seventy-four. Surely it would be more becoming, and more profitable as well, to try to understand, rather than merely to denounce, this reaction against Milton. Group ferocities and tribal war-dances I enjoy, but I find in the serene interest of comprehension a more enduring pleasure.

Well, in the first place, Milton wasn't an amiable person. We may admire his courage, his devotion to his high calling, but there is little in his character that can make us love him, as we can love almost all the great English poets. He was, as are most geniuses, an egotist, and like those two other sublime artists, Dante and Michelangelo, he was arrogant, harsh, truculent, and capable, even more than they were, of inspiring the most intense repugnance.

¹ 'Quam male Phoebicolis convenit ille locus.' (Elegia prima ad Carolum Diodatum.)

Soul awful—if the earth has ever lodged

An awful soul,

was the way his awed admirer, Wordsworth, described him in the Prelude.

Moreover, the kind of poetry, magical, evocative verse, which brings tears to the eyes and gives us that shiver down the spine which Housman has described as the effect of true poetry, is not what young people care for now; and the exquisite choice of diction it demands seems to them silly, or at the best a waste of time. What they seek for is 'hard, positive subject-matter', not beauty of expression.

Well, taste changes with the changing generations and with the circumstances of which that taste is the almost inevitable product. I and my contemporaries were brought up in what we now see to have been a kind of Golden Age—one of those halcyon interludes in the world's history, when men could talk at their leisure, and read and re-read the books they liked. But now that the sun of our day is setting amid dark clouds, what comfort, with the black prospect which faces them, can our successors derive from the thought of

MODERN CRITICS

Hesperus, and his daughters three
That sing about the golden tree?

And in the conflict which lies before them,
what auxiliar aid can be given them

By Knights of Logres, or of Lyones,
Lancelot or Pelleas, or Pellenore?

The learned leisure, the labours of the file, the exquisite pain and pleasure of polishing their phrases are the torment and privilege alone of the craft-conscious artists into whose pockets, as into the pockets of the well-endowed Milton, the world keeps on putting supplies of its negotiable coin. But these stores of old gold are almost exhausted now, and the necessity of writing for one's living blunts the appreciation of writing when it bears the mark of perfection. Its quality disconcerts our hasty writers; they are ready to condemn it as preciousness and affectation. And if to them the musical and creative powers of words convey little pleasure, how out of date and irrelevant they must find the magic and the music of Milton's verse! It would not be generous, I suppose, to compare them to those detractors of Dryden whom his vindicator, Charles Blount, described as being like 'those crabbed-fac'd Maids who wished there were no such things as Beauty and Husbands because they have none'.

IX

Perfection, as that admirable critic, Swinburne, pointed out, is apt to be hated at its first appearance; it must be seen to be loved, and few have eyes to perceive it. To none but these few can it be acceptable at first; and only because they are the final legislators of opinion, the tacit and patient lawgivers of time, does it ever win acceptance. Now Milton from his earliest years had determined to seek for perfection, and for such an object, 'hitherto unsought and undreamed of by English poets', he sacrificed everything, and achieved it. An objective of this nature, Dr. Mackail (from whom I am quoting) goes on to say, 'will allow of no rival, and exacts prodigious payment. . . . Like the merchantman of the parable, he sold all he had to buy that one pearl.'¹ Milton dwells apart with

¹ J. W. Mackail, The Springs of Helicon (1909), pp. 147-8.

Virgil and Dante, in a kind of royal solitude; among the poets who followed after him, Pope and Gray and Tennyson are the only English writers who never published anything till it was as perfect in phrasing as they could make it.

However, Mr. Middleton Murry tells us, a great work of literature is not so much a triumph of language as a victory over language, or, as Dr. Leavis has said, 'Milton displays a feeling for words, rather than a capacity for feeling through them.'¹ This thought (if it be a thought) places on a more plausible basis the modern distaste for Milton's poetry. I think I understand the notion (or do I?); an earnest meaning, which blazes through the paltry words which almost fail to express it. This then, I say to myself, is style; style being, as Mr. Herbert Read has said, spontaneity—a perfect and prompt sincerity in the expressing of important meaning.

Mr. Eliot tells us that he found, in one of D. H. Lawrence's letters, a description of what was the ideal before him as a poet. 'The essence of poetry', Lawrence had written, 'with us in this age of stark and unlovely actualities is a stark directness, without a shadow of a lie, or a shadow of deflection anywhere. . . . This stark, bare, rocky directness of statement, this alone makes poetry to-day.' The creation of poetry, Mr. Eliot believes, we are told, springs out of suffering, and is its expression.¹

¹ Revaluation, p. 50.

And yet the history of literature seems to show that the 'stark' expression of suffering and true feeling is generally poor stuff. 'Nowhere', as Jowett tersely remarked, 'is there more true feeling, and nowhere worse taste, than in a churchyard.'

Milton's great dirge Lycidas has therefore puzzled critics who are of Mr. Eliot's way of thinking. Lycidas is generally admitted to be one of the most perfect pieces of pure literature in existence, and the touchstone, as Tennyson said, of poetic taste.

Dr. Tillyard finds himself somewhat puzzled by this problem. Believing as he does that every great poem must have true feeling behind it, he cannot but ask himself what is the feeling behind this lovely pastoral, with its rivers, its fountains, sheep and pastures, and its sudden, irrelevant, savage, unprovoked attack on contemporary bishops? Ostensibly written as a lament on the death by drowning of a Fellow of Milton's College, Edward King, it was plainly not inspired by any deep grief at the loss of this reverend young gentleman.

¹ Matthiessen, pp. 89, 101.

Why, surely, Dr. Tillyard cries at last in triumph, it was the fear of drowning that gives Lycidas its profounder meaning! King had been with Milton at the same College; he too had written verse, and he too had sailed the sea, as Milton was about to sail it. Was not Milton in danger of completing the analogy by getting drowned himself?

One thing that I greatly admire in the Cambridge critics is their complete unawareness that such a thing as the reductio ad absurdum exists. I wish that, after proving hydrophobia to have been the inspiration of Lycidas, one of them would expound to us the significance of Oberon's speech, 'Once I sat upon a promontory', or that of Coleridge's poem, Kubla Khan, or of the supremely beautiful last chapter of Ecclesiastes beginning, 'Remember now thy Creator in the days of thy youth'—a chapter for which a not very edifying explanation is usually provided.

X

Even more thought has been devoted by modern critics to the meaning of Paradise Lost; to the problem of what the poem is really about, and what was Milton's state of mind when he wrote it. Earlier generations found no problem here; had not Milton stated plainly his purpose in the very opening lines of his epic? But, as Dr. Tillyard says, 'such simple-mindedness can ill satisfy a generation which is sceptical of professed motives and which suspects the presence of others, either concealed or not realised by the author'.¹

Sir Herbert Grierson enumerates the various schools of thinkers, and their various and extremely divergent conclusions.² First of all there is the orthodox view, which practically began with Addison, and which Dr. Johnson accepted. According to this view, Paradise Lost is, with Paradise Regained, a rendering in verse of the great doctrines of Christianity—the Fall of Man and his Redemption through his faith in Christ. This view, however, is contested by two schools of Christian thinkers, the Protestants alleging that the main doctrines of Evangelical religion—humility, charity, Salvation through the Blood of our Saviour, are hardly mentioned in this poem. On the other hand those who reverence

¹ Tillyard, Milton, p. 237.

² Cross Currents in English Literature of the XVIIth Century, pp. 251–63.

the Catholic tradition find that Milton draws little attention to the two great foundations of their faith, the Virgin Birth and the Crucifixion. Indeed the tragic figure of Christ crucified, which has won the heart and been the consolation of countless generations, finds little mention in this so-called Christian epic.¹

Cardinal Newman describes both Milton and Gibbon as authors to whom good Catholics must feel a great repugnance. Great English authors, he admits, but each 'breathing hatred to the Catholic Church in his own way, each a proud rebellious creature of God, each gifted with incomparable gifts'.²

With all this diversity of contradictory views about Milton's meaning, it has seemed necessary to have recourse to the modern theory of an unconscious Milton, who, without knowing it, wrote with a purpose very different from that of his conscious self.

As to what was the purpose of this unconscious Milton in what he regarded as his attempt to justify the ways of God to men, there are two ¹ 'What overcame the world was what Saint Paul said he would always preach; Christ and him crucified. Therein was a new poetry, a new ideal, a new God' (Santayana, Little Essays, p. 61).

² Quoted by Grierson in Cross Currents, p. 255.

main theories current, neither of which does him much credit among earnest students. According to one theory, Milton, though exquisitely susceptible to the charm of women, was—and perhaps owing to that very susceptibility—at heart a hater of these ‘fair Atheists’, Paradise Lost being, with his pamphlets on divorce, a betrayal of his spite against his first wife for what he considered her cruel ill-treatment of him. According to this view, Paradise was lost when Adam was induced to partake of

That crude Apple that diverted Eve . . .
Against his better knowledge, not deceav'd,
But fondly overcome with Femal charm.

These thinkers quote the perfectly uncalled-for outburst of Adam to Eve in Book X:

O why did God,
Creator wise, that peopl'd highest Heav'n
With Spirits Masculine, create at last
This noveltie on Earth, this fair defect
Of Nature, and not fill the World at once
With Men as Angels without Feminine,
Or find some other way to generate
Mankind? This mischief had not then befall'n.

This mischief, due not only to the triviality of Eve's mind, but to the sensual folly of Adam, as he himself confesses—this yielding was the origin of Original Sin, and the triumph of Satan, who represents Passion, over Christ, that is to say Reason.

MODERN CRITICS

The moral therefore of Paradise Lost, as of Samson Agonistes, is that a husband must keep his wife in her proper place:

Hee for God only, shee for God in him.

Therefore Gods universal Law

Gave to the man despotic power

Over his female in due awe,

Not from that right to depart an hour,

Smile she or lowre.

Still more numerous is the Satanic school of Miltonists, who maintain that Satan, being an embodiment of the unconscious Milton, was the real hero of Paradise Lost. Satan possessed the obstinate pride, the undaunted courage, the heroic energy which was a part of the nature of the rebel poet. Milton, Blake said, was of the party of the Devil without knowing it; a view in which Shelley enthusiastically concurred.

The Satan of Paradise Regained is very different from the figure of 'faded splendour wan', yet regal port, which towers over us in the earlier epic,

Like Teneriff or Atlas unremov'd.

He has become a polished diplomatist and a disputer about culture and morals, in place of a devil venturing all for empire and revenge.¹ And yet, as Mr. W. Menzies has pointed out in his fine study 'Milton: the Last Poems', the Satan of Paradise Regained retains in his character much of the conscious, or the unconscious, Milton. 'The fact is . . . that Milton has put so much of his own inmost self into Satan's character, and cannot take it back at will.'² He is so magnificent a creation, and is fashioned out of such sound and true metal, that he is proof against even the assaults of his own Creator.

Nowhere is the conflict between the Puritanic

¹ If I may interpolate a notion of my own—at least I have not met it elsewhere—I should like to suggest that something of the Satan of Paradise Lost is to be found in Byron's heroes, in Childe Harold, in Cain, in Lara, in the Giaour, and above all in Manfred. Most of these share with Satan a kind of Titanic self-assertion, still unconquered, still unreconciled, proud though in desolation—and a high disdain from sense of injured merit, and secret woe; and though not unconscious of goodness, and 'virtue in her shape how lovely', are doomed by some mysterious fate to pursue their own ruin and the ruin of those they love. Chateaubriand claimed, however, these Byronic heroes as offspring of his René. But the origin of 'Byronism', and the influence of the Byronic ideal on all the literatures of Europe, has been the subject of many studies. A summary list of these can be found in Professor Elton's Survey of English Literature, 1780-1830, vol. ii, pp. 419-20.

² Essays and Studies by Members of the English Association, vol. xxiv (1939), p. 104.

Milton who dictates moral strictures, and the genius who often speaks through Satan's mouth, more strikingly apparent than in the great scene of the Temptation in Paradise Regained, when the Enemy of Mankind points from the 'specular mount' on which he stands with Christ in Palestine, across the Aegean to 'the eye of Greece', to Athens, and gives utterance to the most golden, the most glowing panegyric of the land of Attica, of the arts and eloquence and sublime poetry, the civil wisdom and philosophy which compose the world's immortal debt to the 'old and elegant humanity of Greece'. If this indeed is the real Milton speaking, surely we may repeat in his praise, more briefly than in the praise of any other modern member of our species, what Pindar sang of Peleus and Cadmus, that 'though their lives had not been without disaster, yet they had been vouchsafed the most perfect felicity attainable by mortals, since each of them had heard the golden-filleted Muses singing, one on Mount Peleus, the other at his wedding in Seven-Gated Thebes'.

XI

And still of these explanations of Milton's poems there seems to be no end. Thus, for instance, Dr. Gilbert Murray writes that his own feeling is 'that, in the main, his imagined world is almost nothing to him but a place of beauty, a sanctuary and an escape'. One of the most learned of our English Miltonists, Sir Herbert Grierson, quotes this judgement with a qualified approval; he thinks that on the whole it is a true one, though, he adds, it puts Milton too completely into the school of Spenser (whom he had indeed declared to be his master) and into that also of the author of The Earthly Paradise.¹

The latest and, to my mind, the most common-sense, and at the same time the most profound, of the explanations of Paradise Lost, comes, like our young Crusaders, from the Western regions of the United States, but from one who speaks with a weight of authority much exceeding theirs. The voice is that of Professor Elmer Edgar Stoll of Minnesota University, whom many regard as being, next to Sir Edmund Chambers, the greatest of living Shakespeare scholars. Professor Stoll has applied his sanity, his enlightened manly common sense, and also his great learning to this Miltonic problem, and, as with many Shakespeare problems, he has brushed aside much sophistication and academic cobweb. While admitting that the new German, Swedish and French, and older American investigators have added greatly to our knowledge of Milton's sources, he thinks that, led astray by the new psychology and by the craving for startling explanations, they have imagined an incredible Milton, a humanist son of the Renaissance and of the civilization of Greece. They seem deliberately to close their eyes to the fact (though it stares them in the face) that Milton was a Puritan, an English Puritan of the age of Cromwell, and (as far as is possible to a poet) more a Puritan than anything else. He literally believed in the Puritan interpretation of the Bible, he expounded both in poetry and prose the Puritan doctrines. His Puritanism, as Professor Stoll points out, instead of being modified by the growing liberalism of the times he lived in, is more and more apparent in his successive poems. Lycidas is more Puritan than L'Allegro, Paradise Lost than Lycidas, Paradise Regained than Paradise Lost, and Samson Agonistes is the most Puritan of all his poems. In these three, as in Comus, the central situation is that of yielding to, or overcoming, temptation—and yet no notion is more opposed to the Greek spirit than these foreseen and necessary conclusions. In Paradise Lost his consistent purpose was to show how God brings good out of evil, and makes the superhuman life in Eden slope down by delicate gradation 'to the level of life that men lead and always have led', 'to human life as we know it, and as Milton knew it, of a mingled web, good and ill together, dim, sad but very dear'. 'Heaven and Hell give place to Earth; the exalted passions and unreal light or gloom of either yield to the twilight of human existence on this familiar earth.'

¹ Cross Currents, p. 262.

As in the light of this interpretation I read again the last books of Paradise Lost, I find them suffused by a sunset glow, as beautiful in its mildness as the gloom and splendour of the earlier books. Michael's revelation to Adam of God's willingness to forgive as shown in His rainbow promise to Noah; the forecast of what life may still promise in 'this transient World, the Race of time', and how the just may drop like ripe fruit to earth and fall, after a life of blameless joy, into

A death like sleep,
A gentle wafting to immortal Life—so compassionate is the great Archangel that our first parent begins to wonder whether he should really repent the transgression he had committed, since its consequences might prove so much more good than evil.

‘Nor love thy Life nor hate’, is Michael’s admonition to the human sinners, whom God had commanded him to dismiss from Paradise,

Not disconsolate, . . .
Though sorrowing, yet in peace.

XII

But is so great a conception of a great artist enough to shed the light of immortality—

Bright effluence of bright essence increate—upon this poem? It is not. A poem may be wonderfully planned, rich with thought and variety of incident, but it must be poetry, or else it is less living than any other form of literature. Meaning, as Housman has said, is of the intellect, poetry isn’t. Not only the thing said makes poetry, but the way of saying it. What is that way is a question which it is vain to ask.

Housman quotes Milton’s line:

Nymphs and Shepherds, dance no more
‘What is it in those six simple words’, he asks, ‘that can draw tears, as I know it can, to the eyes of more readers than one?’¹ It is an essence, a spirit that escapes all analysis, the light that never was, il tremolar della marina that Dante saw as he emerged at dawn from the Inferno. Useless therefore to seek in the architecture of Milton's great poem, or in the sources of his story, for the immortality of his poem. Nor in his thought; for Milton's mind was not that of a comprehensive thinker, his pamphlets do not reveal any wide horizons of philosophic outlook. Nor in the materials of Paradise Lost do we find much that was not current in the common stock of European literature. The story of Paradise Lost had been told before him by Anglo-Saxon poets, by Swedes, Dutchmen, and Italians. But we do not read any of them; even the greatest of these, the Dutch Vondel, is not read, I am told, in Holland. We read Milton, as we read Dante, for his literary value, not his thought. And anyhow, what the Muses think is of little interest: what we care for is what they sing.¹

¹ The Name and Nature of Poetry, p. 46.

A wiser and more gentle soul than Milton, and a profounder thinker, was his younger contemporary, the Platonist, Henry More, who entered Christ's College the year before Milton left it, and remained there all his life. He, too, was a poet, but his immense poems have been rightly described as among the most unreadable poems ever written. More was totally deprived of that mastery of verbal music, that inspired ordering of consonants and vowels, by means of which Milton, like his master Spenser, flatters and charms our ears. Sound, which Pater said was more than half our thought, was to Milton a matter of supreme importance. Thus, for instance, the five opening lines of Lycidas,

¹ 'Il ne faut pas demander à la lyre ce qu'elle pense, mais ce qu'elle chante.' Chateaubriand, Mémoires d'Outre-Tombe, Livre IX.

Yet once more, O ye Laurels, and once more
Ye Myrtles brown, &c.,

Swinburne described as the most musical in all the known realms of verse. And who could be a better judge of the music of verse than Swinburne? If indeed, as with some fragment of Greek verse, only these five lines survived of Milton's poetry, would they not suffice to make his name immortal?

One of the most 'serious charges' which Mr. Eliot brings against Milton is his devotion to, and expertness in, the art of music. These produced a weakness, Mr. Eliot says, of his visual imagination, whose sensuousness, such as it was, had been weakened by early book-

Babylonish Dialect, in itself harsh and barbarous, but made by exalted genius, and extensive learning, the vehicle of so much instruction and so much pleasure, that, like other lovers, we find grace in its deformity.'

This charge is repeated over and over again, without Dr. Johnson's qualifications, by those who write in disparagement of Milton, from Ezra Pound to the Cambridge critics, Dr. Leavis and Professor Bonamy Dobrée. It is indeed what they consider the weightiest of the charges against Milton. When Mr. Eliot speaks out explicitly at last in a volume edited by Herbert Read,¹ and brings, in a little eight-paged 'exposure' essay, several charges against that poet, one of them is 'in respect to the deterioration—the peculiar kind of deterioration—to which he subjected the language'. One element of this deterioration is Milton's involved syntax, which he compares, to its disadvantage, with the development of Joyce's gibberish in his great Work in Progress. Mr. Eliot admits, it would seem reluctantly, that Milton is a great poet; but, he adds, 'it is something of a puzzle to decide in what his greatness consists. On analysis, the

¹ Essays and Studies by Members of the English Association, vol. xxi (1936), pp. 32-40.

it may be called a grammatical inversion. To take the simplest case, the position of the adjective with regard to its substantive: in French it generally follows the substantive, and this is in most cases its proper place, and for this reason alone descriptions of scenery are generally more pictorial in French prose than in English, the necessarily frequent adjectives being in their natural position in French; the common use sets the epithet before the object, and when this is a malposition of place, a poet must invert either his grammar or his ideas.¹

(As an illustration of this beauty of inversion we may compare Milton's 'darkness, visible', a Rembrandtesque phrase which is superior in its beauty to my mind to 'visible darkness' or even to Bentley's 'transpicious gloom').

In writing of the transposition of adjectives which produce grammatical inversions, Bridges said that what was true of adjectives was true of every word in the sentence. The damage done to our speech by our loss of inflections has, in spite of its immense advantages in perspicuity and ease, been more than once noticed; and attention has been called to delicate and innumerable beauties which Greek and Latin writers (especially Latin) can create by the subtle placing of their words. Robert Bridges illustrates this beauty, this graceful variety of syntax which is forbidden to us, by an example from the second collect at Evening Prayer in our Prayer Book—‘Give unto Thy servants that peace which the world cannot give.’ This is a translation, he says, of the Latin da servis tuis illam quam mundus dare non potest pacem. ‘The English is good,’ Bridges adds, ‘but the artistic order of the Latin words, which in English would be an unintelligible disorder, assists and enforces the meaning without the slightest obscurity, and the words group themselves in a sort of dance figure, instead of a “march past”.’¹

¹ Collected Essays, Papers, &c. of Robert Bridges, IV, A Critical Introduction to Keats (1929), pp. 108-9.

Now this cast-iron word-order which most of us are forced to use to express our meaning, Milton deliberately broke now and then, to give variety to his syntax. Examples of a bold use of classical idiom will be found, for instance, in the lines,

That Shepherd who first taught the chosen Seed
In the Beginning how the Heav’ns and Earth
 Rose out of Chaos.

That sea-Beast
Leviathan, which God of all his works
 Created hugest that swim the Ocean stream—

¹ S.P.E. Tract IX, p. 20.

MODERN CRITICS

Bacchus that first from out the purple Grape,
Crush't the sweet poyson of mis-used Wine
After the Tuscan Mariners transform'd
Coasting the Tyrrhene shore, as the winds listed,
On Circes Iland fell (who knows not Circe
The daughter of the Sun? Whose charmed Cup
Whoever tasted, lost his upright shape,
And downward fell into a groveling Swine).

Milton, Addison wrote, raised his language by the borrowing of foreign idiom. All of us have learned to love the vivacity of those idioms of Anglo-Irish speech: 'I took the hand of her,' 'Is herself at home?' 'He interrupted me, and I writing my letters.' These are translations into English of idioms which are perfectly correct in Irish.

Indeed, how anyone with the least historical knowledge of that exquisite amalgam and shimmering mosaic of Anglo-Saxon, Danish, Greek and Latin, Dutch and French words and idioms which makes our language the speech of Shakespeare—the most composite, varied, eloquent, and in many ways the most beautiful form of human utterance, can bring as a grave charge against Milton his attempt to make it by his borrowings still richer and more sublime—such a charge as this is something which may well amaze the philologist. And Milton, moreover, while enriching with foreign idioms our uninflected speech, is yet careful to preserve and give emphasis to those inflections which we still preserve.

Him the Almighty Power
Hurl'd headlong flaming from th' Etherial Skie . . .
Him haply slumbring on the Norway foam . . .
Whom thus the meager Shadow answerd soon.
In one of the supreme scenes of Paradise Lost, the scene of the Temptation and the Fall, Adam says to Eve after this disaster,

Mee first

He ruin'd, now Mankind; whom will he next? . . .
In the lines,

// Me miserable! which way shall I flie
// Infinite wrauth, and infinite despaire?

Milton indulges in the double pleasure of borrowing a Latin idiom (me miserum) and of using the personal pronoun in its inflected form.¹

¹ Mr. A. W. Verity, in his admirable edition of Paradise Lost (Cambridge University Press, 1910), states that in the phrase 'Us dispossess' (vii. 142), Milton meant the pronoun to be in the dative, 'as suggesting the Latin ablative absolute more than the nominative absolute does'. Thus 'me overthrown' (in S.A. 463) has more of a Latin sound than 'I overthrown'. Mr. Verity gives in his notes hundreds of examples of Milton's borrowing of Greek and Latin idioms.

XVI

Bored as one may well be by the talk about Milton's spiritual message, or by the explanations in accordance with the new psychology of his unconscious meaning, it is certainly a temptation to treat this great Puritan epic merely as a marvellous verbal achievement—an amazing episode in the history of the English language. To one who is above all a vocabularist, the temptation is all the stronger to explain the magic of this magician (as far as it is capable of explanation) by the words he used; and since it is undoubtedly from the potency of these words that, in spite of the remoteness of its subject, Paradise Lost still survives, while other religious epics are forgotten, how can one help regarding Milton, in the way Carlyle is now coming to be regarded, as a writer who had filled his memory and imagination with sounding vocables, which at last burst out, not only, as with Carlyle, in glorious invective, but with the incomparable music of Milton's lovely song as well?

To take one instance of the miracles which he performs with words, let us watch him touch with his enchanting wand that object to be found in most old-fashioned houses, the nuptial couch. In hymning the familiar theme of wedded bliss, he says,

Here Love his golden shafts imployes, here lights
His constant Lamp, and waves his purple wings,
Reigns here and revels.

But attractive as is such a hard-boiled explanation of literary phenomena, we shall be forced, if we proceed to boil our egg still harder, to admit that important, and almost decisive, as is the linguistic element of Milton's poem, the triumph of a work like Paradise Lost cannot be explained as being due to a mere accumulation of words and phrases, however splendid. There must be a fusion of these ingredients, there must be form, there must be control of the material for some great conscious, or perhaps unconscious, end, and if we go on to adamantize our egg into a crystalline lucidity, it will reveal to us the shining truth that any supreme work of art is the product always, or almost always, of a great imagination, the echo of a lofty mind, or of a soul possessing some kind of greatness.

Of the fusion of sound and sense, by means of which such a personality can portray its visions, and vitalize and give an intense significance to its meanings—this alchemy is the ultimate secret of literature, whose explanation has escaped, and will probably for ever escape, critical analysis. Only by its results can we know it. I have written already of that verbal music which helps Milton to hold his enchanted hearers spell-bound; but his charm is by no means—nor indeed principally—a matter of sound alone. I will only note that the words we use to describe this mysterious power, spell, charm, enchantment, evocation, are all in their origin terms of magic and conjuration. Does not this suggest that great poets, and perhaps most of all the great poet Milton, possess something of the power of the magicians and exorcists and wizards, who, by the rhythmic collocation of wonder-working sounds, appeal, or used to appeal, to the deep and obscure experiences of our nature—to the rhythm of prehistoric dances, and the singsong of charms and conjurations? Those experiences may have sunk long since below the surface of our conscious memory, and yet we feel them in our bones; they seem almost to live in the pulsation of our blood, in the rhythm of our breathing.

Peor, and Baalim,
 Forsake their Temples dim,
 With that twise-batter'd god of Palestine, . . .

MILTON AND HIS

And sullen Moloch fled,
Hath left in shadows dred,
His burning Idol all of blackest hue.
In vain with Cymbals ring,
They call the grisly king,
In dismal dance about the furnace blue; . . .

When we remember lines like these, or the lines from Lycidas about the 'great vision of the guarded Mount', and all Milton's litanies of names, we need not wonder at Macaulay's saying that Milton's poetry acts like an incantation, and his words are words of enchantment.

XVII

Few poets, except Wordsworth, have told us more about themselves than Milton. First of all there are the autobiographical digressions in his prose pamphlets which are so numerous that a volume into which they have been collected runs to many pages. Moreover his poems are full of his own experience; not only passages about his blindness, his loneliness and disillusion, and his love of sacred song; but leavening the Paradise Lost, 'and colouring the whole splendid mass of thought, theology, and fancy', is Milton's own experience.

I have read a good number of books about

Milton, but of them all, the sharpest impression of the strangeness and unique quality of Milton's being I have derived from the little book in which the above phrase is printed, a book written by the Cambridge-born, but Oxford-educated, scholar and novelist, Miss Rose Macaulay. 'Nothing that was Milton', Miss Macaulay goes on, 'nothing that had happened to Milton, throughout his dreaming, passionate and disillusioning life, but is to be found in Paradise Lost.' Miss Macaulay mentions first of all the imaginative child, poring over Sylvester, and gathering words from that poet, then the boy at school and Cambridge, collecting phrases from the classics. Then the country loveliness of his rural retreat at Horton, then Italy, his visit to Galileo and to Vallombrosa, his unhappy marriage, and his fall from the Paradise of that dream 'on to the hard, disillusioning and barren earth', and his second fall into the pessimism as to the world's future which succeeded his first glorious faith in the Revolution.

'This huge, baroque, classic, romantic, Catholic, Protestant, devil-haunted, learned, amusing, derivative, unique fairy-tale', as Miss Macaulay describes the Paradise Lost, with its 'wily serpent, the bustling, skirmishing, good and bad angels, the capricious and somewhat unreasonable Almighty presiding over a Ptolemaic universe of spheres within spheres . . . is by turn magnificent, engaging, tragic, tedious, fantastic, and entertaining; and has, throughout, the queer enchantment of the exotic, monstrous mind which shaped it.¹

This is indeed a sling full of epithets to hurl at this Goliath of our literature. But Miss Macaulay possesses by collateral inheritance from the great laudator of Milton's vocabulary her rank as a mistress of epithets, and when she calls the mind of Milton 'exotic' and 'monstrous' she is, to my seeming, justified in her daring.

Milton is certainly the strangest of portents, an historical problem, a literary enigma. Something unique, unheard of, 'a Phoenix gazed by all', he appears from the time he left St. Paul's School 'as scholarly, as accomplished and as handsome a youth as that school had ever sent forth', through his residence at Cambridge, where his delicate beauty, the peculiar grace of his appearance, brought ridicule on him, though something fierce in his nature, as well as his power of fence, caused him to be feared and hated. His arrogance, too, made him unpopular, and the haughty fastidiousness of his taste in morals, his bright virtue, and 'young virginity of righteousness'. Castigated was he? Well, they thought this truculent Sir Galahad deserved reprehension; and reprehension he did perhaps deserve, when he began to pour out so furious a flood of abuse on the 'canary-sucking, swan-eating' English prelates. Reprehension, too, for the way he behaved to the young girl he married; and, at the end of his life, his treatment of his neglected daughters.

¹ Milton, by Rose Macaulay (Harper & Brothers, New York and London, 1935; printed in the United States of America), pp. 128-35.

But what some readers find most difficult to forgive is the Biblical narrowness of the later Milton; that disdain of the Greek philosophers, for instance, which he puts into Christ's answer to Satan when he praised them; the preference Christ expresses for the hymns of Israel; Sion's songs being, he declares, to all true taste,¹ so far superior to the Muses' songs, that the latter may be, he suggests, no more than imperfect copies of originals in Hebrew.

And yet when at last all Milton's hopes had vanished, and as a desolate widower, impoverished, and deserted by his daughters, the 'blind old schoolmaster', as Hazlitt called him, came to be regarded as an infamous outcast, a republican and regicide who had with too great clemency been left unhanged—then, even from the hand of Ezra Pound, I think, must fall the whip. Especially when we see him, as Dr. Johnson describes the old poet, 'in a small house, neatly enough dressed in black cloaths, sitting in a room hung with rusty green; pale but not cadaverous, with chalkstones in his hands. He said, that if it were not for his gout, his blindness would be tolerable.'

¹ It is of interest to note that in this phrase of Milton's Christ, the Oxford Dictionary finds the first example in English of the word 'taste' used with the modern aesthetic significance given to it by the Spanish Jesuit Baltazar Garcíán.

His mind, stored as it was with immense learning and an unequalled treasure of splendid words, was hardly that of a philosopher, an historian, or of a religious mystic; it is not, as Carlyle said of Dante's mind, 'a large Catholic mind; rather a narrow, and even sectarian mind'. 'His greatness has, in all senses, concentrated itself into fiery emphasis and depth. He is world-great not because he is world-wide, but because he is world-deep.'

Of the sublimity of his imagination, however—for he is with Aeschylus among the sublimest of all poets—of the overpowering beauty of his great poems and of the potency of his vast name, there can be no question, as long as there remain any readers who are sensitive to the grandeur and the loveliness of poetic sound.

XVIII

But will the future be peopled with such readers? Who can say? Perhaps this Prince of Language will be driven from his word-palace, to remain with other dethroned potentates in exile for ever. Perhaps Paradise Lost, for which he was paid ten pounds ('too much, too much!' they cry at Cambridge), will join Sylvester's 'Du Bartas', Cowley's Davideis, Prior's Solomon, Addison's Cato in the limbo of unreadable great poems. Certainly the newest push of communist versifiers have not, as far as I know, ever mentioned this epic. Too busy perhaps with the study of their master Marx, they may never have heard the name of Milton mentioned.

I remember once hearing that veteran journalist, Bernard Shaw, say that any writer who had to spend more than thirty seconds to find the word he wanted should certainly give up writing. If such persons are to sit in the high seats of learning, this will probably be one of the rules that they will most rigorously enforce. But perhaps such disparagers of fine writing will come to be considered (as Dr. Johnson said of the disparagers of Milton), 'not as nice, but as dull', who should, he adds, in a curiously modern phrase, 'be pitied for their want of sensibility'.

Personally I don't believe that those who are not interested in the art of words will triumph in the end. The whole history of literature seems to show that words survive in the oddest fashion the uses they are put to: one burning question burns itself out, and then another; one crisis is forgotten as a second follows, and we come to read the most earnest prophets for their style.¹ For words, as Hazlitt said, are the only things that last for ever; they are more durable than the everlasting hills. Things are a mere mockery to the understanding; 'bodies, actions moulder away, or melt into a sound into thin air'. 'By words', Sir Walter Raleigh wrote, 'the world was shaped out of chaos, by words the Christian religion was established among mankind.'

'Weep no more' are the fitting and final words with which to address the lovers of Milton:

¹ 'Such is the common lot of preachers and moralists. It has happened to Ecclesiastes and Isaiah and Plato, to Dante and Donne, to Bunyan and Jeremy Taylor. It is simply that men's feelings about beauty are more vital than their theories about good.' F. L. Lucas, Studies in French and English, p. 49.

MODERN CRITICS

Weep no more, woful Shepherds weep no more,
For Lycidas your sorrow is not dead,
Sunk though he be beneath the watry floar,
So sinks the day-star in the Ocean bed,
And yet anon repairs his drooping head,
And tricks his beams, and with new-spangled Ore,
Flames in the forehead of the morning sky.

Now Lycidas the Shepherds weep no more—at least one of them doesn't. And if, as he reads Milton, his eyes are dimmed (as sometimes happens) the cause of this will not be any dread lest modern criticasters may shove the immortal poet from his throne. It will be due to the poignant beauty of the verse. Such literate effusions will be 'Tears of the purest moan', to borrow Milton's phrase, and, as they were described by one of his contemporaries,

Sententious showres: O let them fall,
Their cadence is rhetoricall .

PRINTED IN GREAT BRITAIN
AT THE
UNIVERSITY PRESS
OXFORD
BY JOHN JOHNSON
PRINTER
TO THE UNIVERSITY

